New learning tools available for Developers and Artists on the web

Rhode Island - The two man team known as Tim & Jay, officially launch the self funded social learning website, SLU.SH, into open beta.

slu.sh [Source.Links.Under.Shared.Headings] is a feature-rich hybrid Social-Bookmarking and Social-Networking website that helps individuals find, share and store information relating to Coding, Technology, the Arts, Web development and Applications.

“It was an idea that came out of my frustrations online and the lack of accountability for the quality of the search results I was being served.” said Jay, one half of the development team of slu.sh. “slu.sh intends to add accountability to resource creators and give users a faster way to distinguish the good from the bad. This is one of the fundamental ideas behind slu.sh; that not all resources are equal and that search results, without context and accountability are a waste of time and terrible way to learn.”

The content on slu.sh is handpicked by registered users, often from the deep-web. slu.sh's robust search system uses a combination of filtering and sorting features to give the visitor full control over what they see. Search results are presented with context and discussions and enable users to quickly find the resource that best matches their criteria without having to move through multiple pages or use complicated search forms. Often, results are found with just one keyword.

“slu.sh is not about drilling-down for the information you need, turning what should be a simple 'search-then-find' mission into an unreliable 'guess-then-leave' frustration.” Tim explained. “No longer should algorithms, spiders and the SEO'ness of a website factor into whether or not a resource lands in front of our eyes. Now, it's about quality. It's about what someone else found, slushed, then made available to the community.”
